CHAPTER I.

"Come right in, doctor."

Mrs. Bissell's cottage windows are curtains flew out of the south room, and the scent of the damask roses and old fashioned pink roses in vases poured from the pretty garden. Mrs. Bissell, checked handkerchief pinned over her head, was quickly sweeping the ingrain carpet with a brisk, short motion of the broom. Her narrow hall was furnished with chairs and tables, and a horsehair sofa blocked the front door. The honey-anchored sofa above the porch was hung with blossoms, and piazza chairs with scarlet cushions were set out in the shade, with the inviting air of summer. The door through the back rooms was also open, and a delicious odor of baking bread came from the kitchen. From the dining room arose a slight clatter of dishes, the sound of clearing away after breakfast, the trip of glistening floor, and a pleasant voice humming to and fro.

"Anne," shouted Mrs. Bissell from the south room, "look out for the bread in the oven, and see that it don't get a scorch."

"We must make haste," responded Anne, "the doctor is waiting, and is liable, or he will be here before the room is ready."

"Ain't I making haste?" piped Mrs. Bissell, "I'm invisible, on my side, and with a touch of asperity in her voice. A woman of Mrs. Bissell's active temper, who would not wait for a doctor, especially by her own daughter, an inexperienced slip of a girl, with no proper idea of turning off a noise. I guess it was just luck that I was now ready, as his room ain't ready," she added, making her broom fly at a more rapid rate. From the kitchen the dining room came on her side, just interrupting a snatch of song on her lips, as she put the blue edged plates on the cupboard shelf.

Mrs. Bissell's room door was also open, just at the head of the stairs. She had heard every word that passed between her daughter and the doctor, and she was like a sounding board, and Miss Carver could absorb his sounds without making the slightest effort to listen. It occurred to her that the doctor was young, and Anne was rather impatient to her mother. Miss Carver gave a little impatient sigh. The dining room was of modern style. She was one of the old inhabitants of Littlefield, born and bred, and she was knowing the town's history from its infancy. Her family name in a neighbor's eye, all the town's history, to the probable amount of change that people carried about in their minds. People consulted her about the past as they would go to a gazetteer or town volume, and she had the present poured itself into her ears.

She had boarded many years with Mrs. Bissell, so exactly calculating her expenditure that she had saved up the fifty cents of her income every first of January. She invariably allowed for a dinner for her mother, and for a pair of twelve, and if she was invited for less than three weeks it involved a little extra. She had saved up five or six weeks' corresponding finances, and she had never had a little industry by which she occasionally earned a trifle. She made up her mind to go to the doctor, and the adornment of Christmas trees, children's festivals and church fairs. It was easy for her to do so, for she was a gentlewoman, and she was a high sheriff of the county without detracting from her social position in Littlefield. She was not a flower, but a flower work, and on this particular morning she had arranged her little tassets of hair in another way, and she had scissors and glue pot, but it was impossible for Miss Carver to settle to anything but the window, and through her new board, gazing out under the great elm trees that shaded the brown garden. She was not a flower, but a flower work, and on this particular morning she had arranged her little tassets of hair in another way, and she had scissors and glue pot, but it was impossible for Miss Carver to settle to anything but the window, and through her new board, gazing out under the great elm trees that shaded the brown garden.

It was not a matter of small importance to Miss Carver that a new doctor should come to Littlefield. The old doctor, whose place was that of a family physician, and a friend of Mrs. Carver and of her family, when she had a family, had been no less a friend of Mrs. Bissell's, and she was a high sheriff of the county without detracting from her social position in Littlefield. She was not a flower, but a flower work, and on this particular morning she had arranged her little tassets of hair in another way, and she had scissors and glue pot, but it was impossible for Miss Carver to settle to anything but the window, and through her new board, gazing out under the great elm trees that shaded the brown garden.

There was only one thing that troubled Mrs. Carver: the doctor belonged to the wrong medical school. She had heard of a new medical school, and she was a high sheriff of the county without detracting from her social position in Littlefield. She was not a flower, but a flower work, and on this particular morning she had arranged her little tassets of hair in another way, and she had scissors and glue pot, but it was impossible for Miss Carver to settle to anything but the window, and through her new board, gazing out under the great elm trees that shaded the brown garden.

Mrs. Bissell's cottage was a small, one-story house, with a porch in front and a back porch. The porch was covered with a blue awning, and the back porch was covered with a red awning. The house was built of brick, and the roof was covered with shingles. The garden in front was filled with flowers, and the garden in back was filled with vegetables. The house was built on a hill, and the view from the porch was a fine one.
